Zebra Mussels being stopped at the border

Moosomin Inspection Station has found three boats with invasive species so far this year

BY ASHLEY BOCHEK

The Saskatchewan Watercraft Inspection Station for Invasive Species east of Moosomin has detected invasive species on watercrafts three times so far this season.

The province has been working hard to keep Saskatchewan waters free of zebra mussels and other invasive species. The inspection station at the Moosomin weigh scales is one of six sites that are part of that effort.

Jeri Geiger, team lead for the Aquatic Invasive Species program in Saskatchewan says the Inspection Station east of Moosomin has detected and decontaminated three watercrafts infected with invasive species so far this season.

"We have had three watercrafts with zebra mussels. This would be the most we have had so far this early in the season. It was a bit surprising because I feel like all provinces in Western Canada have increased efforts and outreach and yet we are tending to find more watercrafts moving that are being fouled, so it is concerning."

Geiger says the province is working toward public awareness so individuals understand and perform inspections on their own watercrafts.
